

Lorelei Cropley DrPH, is a Clinical Associate Faculty for Tulane University School of Public Health Undergraduate Program. Dr. Cropley has extensive qualitative, quantitative and mixed methodology research experience. Her career has been focused on program and technical leadership in evaluation, monitoring, and applied research, specifically in the area of health education. She has been involved in developing health education policy and programs in the areas of vector control, maternal and child health (MCH), and water, sanitation and hygiene (WASH) for domestic and international agencies such as CARE International, UNICEF, and various Ministries of Health. She is an expert presenter and writer who has published articles and book chapters, has made conference presentations at numerous domestic and international conferences and has authored papers and evaluation reports on a variety of aspects of global health and development. She is also a reviewer for peer-reviewed journals and conferences. She recently was awarded a Lavin Bernick faculty grant to involve undergraduate students in global health projects, primarily in Latin America.